Theater last evening in almost continuous laughter. It is a Belasco produc-tion, and the program describes the play as a comedy in three acts by Winchell "musical melodrama," presented by ticular, when the doctor nonchalantly enters his office singing a popular "umpety um" to find that he has had no caliers but a young woman in search of a job, whom he engages as his office assistant because she wants to learn to be a nurse. There is more laughter when Budd and his mother enter; still more when he undergoes his examination, but some real acting by Wallace Eddinger when he is forced by desperation to declare the ailment which affects him. The various stages of a comical story reach a climax when the doctor suddenly becomes afflicted with his patient's original disease, lealousy, and all because the doctor himself has fallen in love with the pretty nurse, who ultimately proves she is not quite so unsophisticated as she seems, when she lures him into telling her how to win the one you love without his or her knowing it.

The cast, like the play, is effective. Arthur Byron gives a realistic impersonation of the doctor, who takes life easily and is really quite overwhelmed when he finds a big practice forced upon him through the advertisement of his merits by Budd's mother; Wallace Eddinger, the lovesick young man, who, whatever may be his fallings in that respect, never once permits his characterization to deteriorate into personal silliness, and Martha Hedman, a veritable dream of a nurse. Ida Waterman, as Budd's mother, supplies a delightful comedy role, and Gilbert Douglas is the polished young rival of Budd, who is always the gentleman, even if a bit in love with his own connecit and alive to financial opportunities in love affairs.

The telling of the story gives no conception of the mirth it conceals, and none who saw the play is in doubt as to why it had a record run in New York, or that it will duplicate that record in Chicago, whence it goes after one week given exclusively to Washington.

with a mock marriage and ultimately uses the fact against her in a desire to revenge himself upon her husband. The last act, however, as in all melodramas, brings the bad man to justice and happiness to a home that is blighted for a while. The usual comedy incidents are found to lighten the tension throughout the play, which is well presented by the star and supporting company.

A unique offering in the Cosmos bill is "The Luck of a Totem," an Alaskan Smith and Victor Mapes. But the im-probabilities and laughable absurdities of actors and singers, including Helen of farce are unmistakably furnished by the jealousy of a lovesick young man, a doctor who has never before had a patient and a charming girl who has undertaken the task of being the doctor's asistant just to have somebody in the office when he is away.

Budd Woodbridge, an otherwise likeable normal and honorable young man, is madly in love with Grace Taylor and jealous of Preston de Witt. has found several ways to avoid being utterly commonplace. For one thing, there is no regular villain in the play, although villainous circumstances are present to make life a burden for the girl whose role is assumed by Miss Ryan. Nor is there any one hero who can command the spotlight. In fact, the heroics of the play are spread generously throughout a pleasant company of competent actors, nearly all of whom are given the opportunity to make speeches of the sort which allow them to leave the stare with a quick and dramatic exit, followed by applause. These episodes bear the stamp of that older school of melodrama where the heart throb reigned supreme.

"The Pictures are far above the average of film features and the music is ex-cellent. The feature is Shannon Fife's version of "The Rainbow Princess," with pretty Ann Pennington in the leading role. The play is wholesome and is a dainty vehicle for a very dainty little woman. In its cleanness and charm one is forcibly reminded of "Pomander Walk." Burton Holmes' travelogue, "New and Old Glimpses of Ireland," is not only entertaining but instructive, and so are the comical martial experiences of "Col. Heeza Liar." Col. Heeza friends will be glad to learn that at last he is "yoked," but is as sprightly as ever.
